Procedural History

Action for the dissolution of a marriage, and for other relief, brought to the Superior Court in the judicial district of Middlesex, where the defendant filed a cross complaint; thereafter, the court, Albis, J., rendered judgment dissolving the marriage and granting certain other relief in accordance with the parties' separation agreement; subsequently, the court granted the plaintiff's motion to modify custody of the parties' minor children, and the defendant appealed; thereafter, the Appellate Court, Clark and Seeley, Js., with Bright, C. J., concurring in part and dissenting in part, reversed in part and remanded the case for further proceedings; subsequently, the Appellate Court granted the plaintiff's motion for reconsideration en banc, and the appeal was transferred to this court. Reversed in part; further proceedings.

Opinion

McDONALD, J. The sole issue in this appeal is whether the trial court improperly delegated its judicial authority when it gave the plaintiff father, R. H., the authority to decide the nature and scope of the visitation his ex-spouse, the defendant mother, M. H., could have with their minor child, R. Specifically, the trial court’s visitation order provided that, if, “at any time,” the plaintiff “reasonably determines” that R was negatively impacted by the defendant’s visitation, the plaintiff may, among other things, “suspend” the defendant’s visitation with R. The defendant appeals from the trial court’s decision to grant the plaintiff’s motion for modification of the order of custody over the parties’ minor children. The defendant claims that the trial court improperly delegated its judicial authority to the plaintiff when it gave him the authority to suspend her visitation with R if the plaintiff reasonably determined that the unsupervised visits were causing R to endure negative behavioral or emotional consequences. Although the trial court attempted to balance the interests of the parties and the children, we conclude that the trial court improperly delegated its judicial authority to the plaintiff. Accordingly, we reverse that part of the trial court’s order¹ modifying custody.

¹ Although the trial court’s order addressed various motions filed by the plaintiff, this appeal concerns only the court’s ruling on the motion to modify the order of custody. Accordingly, we do not disturb the trial court’s other rulings.

The following facts and procedural history are relevant to our analysis. Following the dissolution of their marriage, the parties had joint legal custody and shared physical custody of their daughter, S, and their son, R. Over the ensuing months, the parties' ability to effectively coparent broke down. On June 12, 2019, the plaintiff filed a motion to open the judgment and to modify custody that sought sole legal and physical custody of the children. While the June 12 motion was pending, in September, 2019, the parties agreed to a custody evaluation to be performed by a psychologist specializing in family matters and not to consume alcoholic beverages in excess during each party's parenting time with the children. The defendant had abused alcohol, and she agreed to use Soberlink, an alcohol monitoring device.

Before the trial court took any action on the June 12 motion, on October 30, 2019, the plaintiff filed an application for an emergency ex parte order of custody, requesting temporary sole custody of the children on the ground that the defendant had been intoxicated at 6:49 a.m. that same day while the children were in her care. The court granted the emergency application, awarding temporary custody to the plaintiff and ordering that the defendant was to have "reasonable visitation as agreed by the parties and with such supervision as [the plaintiff] may approve or require." The trial court subsequently clarified its order on the emergency application to state that the plaintiff was to have temporary sole physical custody of the children. Numerous other motions were filed by the parties during the months prior to the court's hearing on the June 12 motion.

In June, 2020, the trial court modified the ex parte order of custody to allow the defendant to have unsupervised visitation with her children provided she complied with certain conditions. Thereafter, the defendant filed a motion for clarification, seeking the court's guidance on, among other things, how the parties should proceed if they cannot agree to visitation as required by the court's previous order. In the motion, the defendant explained: "I am asking for clarification because I am being prevented from seeing my children; visitation is being hindered by the plaintiff Since the filing of the ex parte motion, I have seen my children for less than seventy hours in the past year, due to the [plaintiff's] . . . failure to agree to regular and substantial visitation. . . . Not only has [the plaintiff] failed to agree to regular visitation, he has failed to allow any contact between me and my children. I have had no contact with my children since [August 10] 2020." (Emphasis omitted; footnote omitted.) The court denied the motion.

At a status conference in November, 2020, the trial court scheduled a hearing on the various pending motions to begin in April, 2021. Prior to the start of that hearing, however, the plaintiff filed a motion to modify the then existing ex parte order, seeking sole legal custody of the children. Following a hearing on that motion, the trial court declined to award the plaintiff sole legal custody but concluded that the plaintiff would have final decision-making authority in the event of an impasse on certain decisions about the children's therapy or education.

Over the course of six separate dates, spanning several months, the trial court heard evidence concerning the numerous outstanding motions that it had yet to rule on, including the plaintiff's June 12 motion. Thereafter, the trial court issued a memorandum of decision addressing the various pending motions. The trial court found, among other things, that the defendant's behavior was the underlying cause of the majority of the issues between the parties. The court explained that the defendant's "love for the children and [her] positive parenting qualities [were] neutralized by her mistrust of the [plaintiff] and others, her denigration of the [plaintiff], and her efforts to justify her actions and [to] advance her own agenda.”² The trial court also cited several examples of the defendant’s negative conduct, including that she threatened the children’s medical providers with complaints of violations of medical privacy laws, accused S’s therapist of insurance fraud, threatened litigation against R’s school, accused the children’s guardian ad litem of committing check fraud, and threatened to seek the arrest of the parties’ parenting counselor. The court also noted the negative impact some of the defendant’s actions had on her children. As to the plaintiff, the court noted that he “has not always been as communicative about the children with the [defendant] as would be ideal. Under the circumstances, his reticence is understandable, but it has heightened the [defendant’s] mistrust of him. To his credit, the [plaintiff] has been a steady hand in raising the children through the periods of conflict with the [defendant] and her attempts to cope with her personal issues.” As a result, the trial court granted the plaintiff’s June 12 motion and awarded him sole legal custody of the children. It further ordered that the children reside primarily with the plaintiff, explaining that the defendant needed to engage in mental health treatment before her parenting time could be increased.

The trial court’s order also limited the defendant’s visitation with S to family therapy and ordered that the parties may agree on further visitation if recommended by the family therapist. With respect to R, the trial court ordered that “the [defendant] shall also be entitled to have in person visits with [R]” after engaging in at least four sessions with a mental health professional. Relevant to this appeal, the order as to R also provides: “Unless the [plaintiff] reasonably determines, after consultation with [R's] therapist, that the supervised visits are causing negative behavioral or emotional consequences for [R], then the [defendant] shall thereafter be entitled to reasonable, incrementally increased, unsupervised visitation with [R] on a schedule approved by the [plaintiff] from time to time. If, at any time, the [plaintiff] reasonably determines, after consultation with [R's] therapist, that the unsupervised visits are causing negative behavioral or emotional consequences for [R], then the [plaintiff] may either suspend the [defendant's] visitation or reinstate the requirement of supervision of the visits by a third party" (Emphasis added.) It is this particular order that is at issue in this appeal.

² The trial court also concluded that the defendant had not caused any physical harm to the children, and there was no reason to believe that she would do so.

The defendant appealed from the trial court's order. On appeal, the defendant argued, among other things that are not at issue in this appeal, that the trial court had improperly delegated its judicial authority by giving the plaintiff decision-making authority over the defendant's visitation with the children. R. H. v. M. H., 219 Conn. App. 716, 719, 296 A.3d 243 (2023). A majority of the Appellate Court panel concluded that the trial court had improperly delegated its judicial authority and, consequently, reversed in part the trial court's order. Id., 719, 751. The majority reasoned that "the order pertaining to the defendant's visitation with R is an improper delegation of authority because the [trial] court effectively delegated to the plaintiff, in consultation with the child's therapist, the authority to suspend or terminate the defendant's visitation with R and its attendant obligation to consider the best interests of R pursuant to [General Statutes] § 46b-56 (c) before doing so." Id., 740. The majority concluded that, when "a governing statute squarely places the obligation on the trial court to decide custody and visitation in contested disputes, delegation of this responsibility to a nonjudicial entity, whether it be a parent or [a] third party, is impermissible.” Id., 749. Chief Judge Bright concurred in part and dissented in part, concluding in relevant part that the trial court “properly exercised its [statutory] authority . . . by crafting a visitation order that gave the defendant the opportunity to maintain and improve her relationship with R while protecting R’s best interests.” Id., 752 (Bright, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

Thereafter, the plaintiff filed a motion for reconsideration en banc, which the Appellate Court granted, limited to the issue of whether the trial court had improperly delegated its judicial authority. Prior to oral argument before the full Appellate Court, the appeal was transferred to this court pursuant to General Statutes § 51-199 (c) and Practice Book § 65-1. Due to the transfer, and because the Appellate Court’s judgment as to the question of delegation of judicial authority was rendered ineffective when that court granted reconsideration, we review the trial court’s order on this issue, rather than the judgment of the Appellate Court, on appeal.³

On appeal, the defendant contends that a trial court cannot “delegate its judicial authority to any person serving the court in a [nonjudicial] function.” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Nashid v. Andrawis, 83 Conn. App. 115, 120, 847 A.2d 1098, cert. denied, 270 Conn. 912, 853 A.2d 528 (2004). She claims that the trial court’s order empowering the plaintiff to unilaterally suspend her visitation with R was an improper delegation of the court’s judicial authority, as the order impermissibly permitted the plaintiff to define the nature and scope of the defendant’s contact with the children. The defendant argues that “common sense should dictate that, in contentious divorce cases—without findings and charges of abuse—giving one parent control over visitation is an invitation for the parent with control to weaponize that power against the other parent.” (Emphasis omitted.) Relying on the Virginia Court of Appeals’ decision in Rainey v. Rainey, 74 Va. App. 359, 869 S.E.2d 66 (2022), the defendant argues further that, if therapists and other professionals who deal with children on a regular basis cannot be delegated the authority to make visitation orders, then the trial court similarly may not delegate such authority to a litigant in a high conflict case. See id., 387 (“[l]eaving the sole power of increased visitation with such a party invites abuse and inequity”).

For his part, the plaintiff contends that the trial court did not improperly delegate its judicial authority over visitation to the plaintiff because the trial court also concluded that the defendant was not unconditionally entitled to unsupervised visitation. He argues that this case is akin to Lehane v. Murray, 215 Conn. App. 305, 283 A.3d 62 (2022), in which the Appellate Court rejected an improper delegation challenge to a trial court order providing that a father may alter, change, or modify the mother’s ordered visitation schedule; see id., 307, 309; and Zilkha v. Zilkha, 180 Conn. App. 143, 183 A.3d 64, cert. denied, 328 Conn. 937, 183 A.3d 1175 (2018), in which the Appellate Court upheld a trial court’s order deciding that a father did not have any right to custody or visitation but allowing for voluntary visitation at the discretion of his children. See id., 145–46, 168, 172–73. We agree with the defendant.

We begin with the standard of review and the relevant legal principles. Whether the trial court improperly delegated its judicial authority is a legal question over which we have plenary review. See, e.g., id., 170.

“It is well settled . . . that [n]o court in this state can delegate its judicial authority to any person serving the court in a nonjudicial function. The court may seek the advice and heed the recommendation contained in the reports of persons engaged by the court to assist it, but in no event may such a nonjudicial entity bind the judicial authority to [issue] any order or [to render a] judgment so advised or recommended. . . . A court improperly delegates its judicial authority to [a nonjudicial entity] when that person is given authority to issue orders that affect the parties or the children. Such orders are part of a judicial function that can be done only by one clothed with judicial authority.” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Thunelius v. Posacki, 193 Conn. App. 666, 674, 220 A.3d 194 (2019); see, e.g., Valante v. Valante, 180 Conn. 528, 532–33, 429 A.2d 964 (1980) (trial court may not delegate its statutory decision-making authority to nonjudicial entity); see also, e.g., Masters v. Masters, 201 Conn. 50, 64–66, 513 A.2d 104 (1986).

The trial court’s authority to issue orders pertaining to the custody and visitation of minor children is prescribed by statute. Section 46b-56 (a) provides in relevant part that “the court may make or modify any proper order regarding the custody, care, education, visitation and support of the children if it has jurisdiction” Section 46b-56 (a) thus authorizes the trial court alone to make or modify any proper order regarding custody and visitation of a minor child. Subsection (b) of § 46b-56 provides in relevant part that a trial court, in crafting such orders, shall consider “the rights and responsibilities of both parents . . . and the court shall enter orders accordingly that serve the best interests of the child and provide the child with the active and consistent involvement of both parents commensurate with their abilities and interests. . . .” Section 46b-56 (c) requires the trial court, when making or modifying an order as provided in subsections (a) and (b), to “consider the best interests of the child” and enumerates seventeen factors the court may consider. None of the provisions in § 46b-56 permits the delegation by a trial court of its statutory duty to one of the litigants before it.

Our starting point, then, is that the statutory language itself precludes a trial court from delegating decision-making authority over whether a parent has visitation rights to anyone who is not a judge. See General Statutes § 46b-56 (a) (“the court may make or modify any proper order regarding the custody, care, education, visitation and support of the children if it has jurisdiction” (emphasis added)). Only the trial court can modify its prior order regarding visitation. With respect to child custody and visitation orders, § 46b-56 “grants the trial court continuing jurisdiction to make or modify any proper order regarding the education and support of the children and of care, custody and visitation . . . according to the court’s perception of the best interests of the child. . . . This judicial responsibility cannot be delegated, nor can the parties abrogate it by agreement. . . . In the final analysis, the court retains jurisdiction to determine and advance the best interests of the child.” (Citations omitted; emphasis added; internal quotation marks omitted.) Masters v. Masters, supra, 201 Conn. 65–66.⁴

In applying this statutory provision, this court has also explained that a trial court improperly delegates

⁴ In Masters, this court concluded that parties could, by agreement, arbitrate certain matters, such as most child support disputes, without the trial court’s approval. See Masters v. Masters, supra, 201 Conn. 68–69. Significantly, however, we explained that, “[b]ecause determinations of custody go to the very core of the child’s welfare and best interests, most courts prohibit arbitration of custody disputes.” Id., 67.

its judicial authority when that court removes itself entirely from the decision-making process. See, e.g., Valante v. Valante, supra, 180 Conn. 532–33 (trial court authorized domestic relations officer to resolve disagreements with respect to division of marital property, and this court concluded that rendering decision concerning property distribution is judicial function); see also, e.g., Nashid v. Andrawis, supra, 83 Conn. App. 120–22 (trial court’s proposed orders directing that child related matters be resolved through binding arbitration were improper delegation of judicial authority); Weinstein v. Weinstein, 18 Conn. App. 622, 629, 561 A.2d 443 (1989) (trial court’s orders empowering guardian ad litem to resolve disputes between parties were improper delegation of court’s judicial function).

Furthermore, more recent cases from the Appellate Court have recognized the nuances that arise in the context of orders addressing child custody and visitation. For example, in Zilkha, the trial court found that the defendant’s relationship with his children was strained due to years of fighting and conflict between the parties. See Zilkha v. Zilkha, supra, 180 Conn. App. 147–49, 161–62. As a result, the trial court’s postdissolution order limited the defendant’s visitation with his fifteen year old children to voluntary visitation at their discretion. See id., 165. The defendant argued that the trial court impermissibly delegated its judicial authority to the children in giving them sole discretion over his visitation. See id., 168. The Appellate Court concluded that, when the trial court crafted its order, “rather than delegating its responsibility, the court exercised its authority and met its obligation to decide issues of custody and visitation This adjudication by the court was the antithesis of a delegation because it plainly decided that the defendant should not have any right to custody or visitation. The fact that the court’s order left open the possibility of voluntary visits at the discretion of the [children] does not transform the court's decision-making into impermissible delegation." (Emphasis in original.) Id., 172.

Subsequently, the Appellate Court considered whether a trial court had improperly delegated its judicial authority regarding a father's contact with his child to the child's therapist. See Kyle S. v. Jayne K., 182 Conn. App. 353, 370, 190 A.3d 68 (2018). The trial court ordered that "[the child's therapist] will dictate the scope of [the father's] contact with [the child] in a therapeutic setting." (Emphasis omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) Id., 371. The trial court also stated that it was "restricting . . . contact so that the [therapist could] be in charge." (Emphasis omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) Id. The Appellate Court acknowledged that a trial court is permitted to seek advice from a nonjudicial entity but concluded that the trial court had "advanced past that point . . ." Id., 372. Accordingly, the Appellate Court reversed that decision, concluding that the trial court had "improperly removed itself from the decision-making process by permitting [the therapist] to decide the nature and scope of [the father's] contact with [the child]." (Emphasis added.) Id., 373.

Finally, in Lehane, the Appellate Court determined that a trial court's order allowing the defendant father to "'alter, change or modify'" the visitation schedule was not an improper delegation of judicial authority. Lehane v. Murray, supra, 215 Conn. App. 307; see id., 309, 315. The Appellate Court reasoned that the order "did not . . . give the defendant unbridled authority to modify [the plaintiff's] right to visit their son; nor did the [trial] court give the defendant unilateral authority to suspend or terminate [the plaintiff's] parenting access to their son." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Id., 315. The Appellate Court emphasized that the order "permit[ted] the defendant to modify the plaintiff's visitation schedule, not to modify her right to visitation."

(Emphasis in original.) Id. Thus, the Appellate Court concluded, the trial court “properly exercised its decision-making authority” in allowing the defendant to alter, change, or modify the plaintiff’s visitation schedule while not permitting him to reduce, suspend, or terminate the plaintiff’s access to their child. Id., 318.

We find this line of cases from the Appellate Court instructive. We read these cases to stand for the proposition that a trial court cannot remove itself entirely from the decision-making process, and, although a court order may authorize a parent to modify the other parent’s visitation schedule, it may “not . . . modify [the other parent’s] right to visitation.” (Emphasis in original.) Id., 315. We agree. For example, it would not be an improper delegation of judicial authority if a trial court permitted a custodial parent the ability to, within reason, change one day of visitation from Monday to Tuesday because of a legitimate conflict. It would, however, be an improper delegation of judicial authority to authorize the custodial parent to refuse to allow the noncustodial parent who has visitation rights to visit the child, as in the present case. The Appellate Court’s reasoning in Zilkha is not to the contrary. In that case, the Appellate Court concluded that the trial court’s order limiting the defendant’s visitation with his children to voluntary visitation at their discretion was not an improper delegation because the trial court “plainly decided that the defendant should not have any right to custody or visitation.” (Emphasis in original.) Zilkha v. Zilkha, supra, 180 Conn. App. 172.

In the present case, the trial court’s visitation order effectively removes the court entirely from the decision-making process and delegates its authority to the plaintiff to suspend visitation. See, e.g., Valante v. Valante, supra, 180 Conn. 532–33. By contrast, the defendant cannot file a motion to modify visitation without first seeking permission from the trial court to file that motion.

See Practice Book § 25-26 (g). We recognize that the trial court was faced with a difficult situation in which it concluded that the defendant's actions had caused emotional and psychological harm to her children, and its visitation order was an attempt to best address that situation. In this case, however, the trial court exceeded the admittedly broad discretion it had when it authorized the plaintiff to suspend the defendant's visitation.

We conclude that the trial court's order authorizing the plaintiff to exercise unilateral control over the defendant's visitation with R was an improper delegation of judicial authority because the court delegated to the plaintiff, in consultation with the child's therapist, the authority to suspend or terminate the defendant's visitation with R. Unlike the order in Zilkha, in which the trial court concluded that the defendant did not have any right to visitation; see Zilkha v. Zilkha, supra, 180 Conn. App. 172; the order in the present case granted the defendant a specific right to visitation after the defendant engaged in at least four sessions with her mental health professional. The trial court went on to state that the defendant "shall thereafter be entitled to reasonable, incrementally increased, unsupervised visitation with [R] on a schedule approved by the [plaintiff] from time to time." (Emphasis added.) The trial court's order became an impermissible delegation of judicial authority when the court gave the plaintiff, after consultation with the child's therapist, the ultimate authority to suspend the defendant's right to visitation altogether.

Unlike the order in Lehane, the order in the present case was not limited to allowing the plaintiff to modify the visitation schedule; it permitted the plaintiff to unilaterally suspend the defendant's right to visitation with R. Cf. Lehane v. Murray, supra, 215 Conn. App. 315 (order was not impermissible delegation of authority because "the [trial] court did not . . . give the defendant ‘unbridled’ authority to modify her right to visit their son; nor did the court give the defendant unilateral authority to suspend or terminate [the plaintiff’s] parenting access to their son” (emphasis added). The fact that the trial court’s order required the plaintiff to act reasonably and consult with R’s therapist before exercising this authority does not save the order from being an impermissible delegation of judicial authority.

It is important to emphasize that the trial court’s order in this case places the decision-making authority in the hands of a party to the litigation. It is hard to conceive of a class of litigation that is, on the whole, more emotionally charged, conflict-ridden and personally contentious than marital dissolution actions and child custody and visitation disputes. Allowing the custodial parent to make visitation decisions for the non-custodial parent creates a situation ripe for misjudgment and abuse.⁵

We note that the majority of jurisdictions that have addressed whether a trial court can delegate its authority to a custodial parent have concluded that this type of delegation is improper. See, e.g., R. H. v. M. H., supra, 219 Conn. App. 742–43 n.11 (citing cases). We find the reasoning from the Virginia Court of Appeals in a recent case insightful. In Rainey v. Rainey, supra, 74 Va. App. 359, the trial court ordered that the father would have sole physical custody and forbade the mother from contacting the children outside of therapeutic letter writing. See id., 376. The trial court also granted “[the] father sole discretion to consent to supervised visitation between the [m]other and [the] children with a supervisor of [the] [f]ather’s choice if [he] believe[d] that [the]

⁵ This case highlights one problem that may arise when a parent has authority over the other parent. The trial court had ordered that the defendant attend family therapy with the same therapist as S. This requirement was complicated by the fact that the plaintiff did not provide the defendant with the name of S’s therapist.

[m]other is appropriate and will not cause harm to the children” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Id., 383.

On appeal, the Virginia Court of Appeals concluded that the trial court “abdicated its statutory power, and duty, to determine visitation”; id.; and reasoned that, when “the governing statutes squarely place the obligation to make contested visitation decisions on the judiciary, delegation of this responsibility to third parties or parents is unauthorized.” Id., 387. Significantly, the Court of Appeals also explained that, “from a practical standpoint, there are obvious problems inherent in delegating judicial decision-making functions to a party. First, particularly in child custody and visitation cases, parties are likely to have difficulty communicating and seeing past their inherent biases. Leaving the sole power of increased visitation with such a party invites abuse and inequity.” (Emphasis added.) Id. The court further reasoned that, because the father had no relevant training that would allow him to make clinical determinations with respect to whether the mother’s behavior would harm the children, the order gave the father “the power to make an uneducated decision by himself” or encouraged him to defer to a trained professional, which was “a [roundabout] way of impermissibly delegating judicial power to a third party.” Id., 388. The Virginia Court of Appeals concluded that the trial court had erred in giving the father the power to determine the mother’s visitation with the children. Id., 391.

There are cases, however, that have concluded that a trial court may delegate authority to a custodial parent. For example, the North Dakota Supreme Court acknowledged the “highly unusual” nature of orders granting visitation subject to a custodial parent’s discretion but nevertheless upheld the trial court’s visitation order, which granted the father visitation at the mother’s discretion, because there was a need to protect the children from the father’s drug use. Wigginton v. Wigginton, 692 N.W.2d 108 (N.D. 2005); see id., 112–13. Similarly, the Alabama Court of Civil Appeals upheld a visitation order that permitted the mother to refuse the father’s visitation with their children “if she believe[d] that he is under the influence of drugs or alcohol or that he is placing the children in an unsafe environment or a place of danger” Watkins v. Lee, 227 So. 3d 84, 85 (Ala. Civ. App. 2017). The court reasoned that, “[i]n light of the evidence presented regarding the parties’ history of domestic violence, the father’s past exposure to drugs, [an] incident in which the son had been burned, the possibility that the father had planned to relocate with the children, the manner in which the father had treated the son, and the father’s recent marijuana use, the trial court could have reasonably concluded that, based on the particular facts and circumstances of [the] case, including the refusal provision in its judgment was a narrowly tailored means of preserving the father’s rights and serving [the] children’s best interests by protecting their health and safety.” Id., 89.

We disagree with the reasoning in these cases to the extent that the cases permit the delegation of judicial authority to custodial parents. As we explained, given the inherent tensions between the parties in visitation cases, we conclude that a trial court shall not delegate to a parent its judicial authority to suspend visitation with the other parent. Moreover, even if the reasoning in these cases is sound, the facts of those cases are inapposite to the present case. Unlike the trial courts in the North Dakota and Alabama cases, the trial court in the present case specifically concluded that the defendant had “not caused physical harm to her children, and there [was] no reason to believe [that] she is a threat to do so.” Acknowledging that the defendant has caused emotional harm to her children, the trial court nevertheless emphasized that the defendant “is an intelligent, engaging woman, who is desperate to have a normal relationship with the children she loves. She has, at times during the pendency of the postjudgment litigation, demonstrated her ability to be an excellent mother” To the extent that a trial court is concerned about the safety of a child at the time it makes its visitation order, the court, in exercising its broad discretion, may make accommodations to ensure the safety of the child. For example, it may require that the visitation be supervised. What a trial court may not do, however, is allow the custodial parent to decide whether the noncustodial parent may even be allowed to visit with his or her child. Thus, even under the rationale in the North Dakota and Alabama cases, a delegation of judicial authority to the plaintiff in the present case would have been inappropriate.

There is good reason that, when a governing statute squarely places the obligation on the trial courts to decide custody and visitation, a trial court may not impermissibly delegate that judicial authority. As an impartial decision maker, the trial court alone “ultimate[ly] [bears] responsibility for determining and protecting the best interests of children in family disputes” Masters v. Masters, supra, 201 Conn. 64. The requirement of impartial decision-making is cast aside when that judicial responsibility is delegated to the custodial parent in a custody and visitation dispute, even though the need for impartial decision makers in such disputes is even more clear. Indeed, given the often contentious nature of postdissolution relationships, a rule permitting a custodial parent to decide visitation poses even greater concerns than a rule permitting objective third parties to decide visitation. See, e.g., Rainey v. Rainey, supra, 74 Va. App. 387. Courts in Connecticut have previously rejected a rule that would permit such a delegation to third parties, such as guardians ad litem; see Weinstein v. Weinstein, supra, 18 Conn. App. 629; and therapists. See Kyle S. v. Jayne K., supra, 182 Conn. App. 372–73. Although we need not decide whether there can ever be a situation in which a trial court may delegate authority to an objective third party, we are confident that drawing the line at delegating authority to a parent to indefinitely suspend visitation is appropriate. Such a practice invites greater occasion for friction and disagreement between parents. As the Shared Parenting Council of Connecticut, Inc., argues in its amicus brief, “[c]hildren are not well served” by orders that “allocate all decision-making authority to” one parent. Such an order, the amicus argues, only adds to the adversarial environment.

Our trial judges face ever-changing and volatile circumstances requiring judicial intervention, even after judgment has been rendered. These judges admirably exercise their broad discretion in contested visitation cases in an effort to accommodate the interests of all of the parties and the children. Often, in these contentious situations, there is an urgent need to make modifications in light of developments in the case. For example, it may be necessary for parents to have rapid access to our courts in instances in which a child’s safety is at risk.

We reaffirm “that decision-making in family disputes requires flexible, individualized adjudication of the particular facts of each case without the constraint of objective guidelines.” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Yontef v. Yontef, 185 Conn. 275, 278, 440 A.2d 899 (1981). “[I]n matters involving child custody, and, by implication, visitation rights . . . the rights, wishes and desires of the parents must be considered [but] it is nevertheless the ultimate welfare of the child [that] must control the decision of the [trial] court. . . . In making this determination, the trial court is vested with broad discretion” (Citations omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) Ridgeway v. Ridgeway, 180 Conn. 533, 541, 429 A.2d 801 (1980). It is critically important that our trial judges be afforded broad discretion when crafting visitation orders in order to best account for the interests of the parties and the children in often highly contentious and ever evolving situations. The trial judges may not, however, delegate to the custodial parent the authority to suspend the visitation rights of a noncustodial parent.

The trial court's order is reversed insofar as that court's modification of custody was based on a determination that a nonjudicial entity may suspend the defendant's visitation rights with R and the case is remanded for further proceedings solely as to that issue.
